

Advocating for Consciousness Freedom: The Call for a 28th Amendment

In a bold proposition, advocates are calling for a 28th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution to enshrine the right to alter or experiment with one's own consciousness through drug use. This call to action stems from a critique of America's handling of the Drug War and the continuous failure to manage addiction and drug abuse effectively.

The Case for Consciousness Freedom:

The article argues that drug use, seen as consciousness exploration, is an inalienable human right. Historically, no society has successfully enforced total abstinence from drugs, suggesting an innate human inclination towards altering consciousness.

Flaws in Current Drug Policies:

Current drug laws are criticized for creating more harm than preventing it, with prisons overflowing with nonviolent drug offenders and a surge in dangerous, unregulated substances due to legal loopholes.

A New Approach to Drug Legislation:

The proposed amendment would not legalize all drugs but recognize the right to consciousness exploration, holding individuals accountable for any harm caused. This approach aims to shift the narrative on drug use, focusing on informed decision-making and personal responsibility.

Conclusion:

This call for a constitutional amendment signifies a radical shift in how drug use is viewed and regulated, emphasizing the need for common sense in drug legislation and a fundamental respect for personal freedom.
